Excerpt from Foreign Crops and Markets, Vol. 38: March 11, 1939 American cotton for future delivery was quoted successively lower; deliveries in the months of heavy movement of the 1939 crop were priced at more than a cent a pound under early futures. This factor had the influence of spurring liquidation, whether of cotton or goods, and also of restricting new buying to small quantities for early delivery. With no improvement in the international political situation the hand-to - mouth trading is expected to continue. Inventories of stock in channels of trade appear to have been reduced. With normal conditions, these will later have to be made good. Spinners, in an effort to keep a program of continuous operation and to meet the intensive competition in most of the free - exchange countries were more interested than usual in cheap cotton.
